In the last few days, circumstances forced the Supreme Court and the Catholic Church in Kerala, two organizations that normally operate in complete secrecy, to open up ___1___ a few of their decisions. Since what came out in the ___2___ were issues of impropriety, the immediate demand from all quarters was for even more openness about the functioning of both these organizations. The Catholic Church is a 2,000 year old organization that has made secrecy an art form. The case isn't too ___3___ for the Supreme Court in India. The key decisions were ___4___ only by a select few insiders and the man in the street was never privy to the machinations. The common man had no option but to ___5___ their decisions or face the consequences, in complete silence.

Like sunlight, the ideal disinfectant, transparency has been considered the panacea against corruption in organizations and society. Transparency allows ___6___ to all decision-making processes.

Decisionmakers know that what ___7___ say or do will be linked to them personally. They all know that their performance will be evaluated by others according to some ___8___ standards.

The decisionmaker is also expected to provide clear reasons for taking any ___9___. Thus, transparency is expected to bring in the twin benefits of clarity about a decision and holding the decisionmaker ___10___ for it. It seems that more transparency can only do more good. Should organizations then open up all their decision-making processes?
