But still need to write an essay

Everything is not as scary as it might seem at first glance, the main thing is to know what and how to prepare for. By the way, the cost of studying in Europe can be comparable with Russian universities, or even lower. For example, the cost of studying at state universities in France sometimes does not exceed 1000 euros per year, which is much cheaper than even at secondary Moscow institutes. Many German universities are generally free even for foreigners.

With language, too, everything is quite simple. In many Russian (especially Moscow and St. Petersburg) schools, foreign languages are taught at a high level today. You can tighten the tongue with ordinary tutors or at language courses. More and more often, Russian parents enroll their children in language courses from high school, just for general development. Then, by the end of school, the need for a tutor on the language disappears altogether. Of course, this applies primarily to English-speaking countries, but you can pull even the less popular French or Spanish to an acceptable level for six months a year of regular classes.

But what about entrance exams?

In our country, admission depends on USE scores. The West also has its own analogues, for which, like the USE, it is quite possible to prepare in advance. For example, in the United States, two types of standardized tests are common: SAT and ACT. The first is more common in coastal states and includes questions on text analysis, math, and English. The second is more common in the western and southern states and also contains questions on the natural sciences. Finding tutors in such tests is difficult, but you can try to prepare yourself. To do this, I advise you to buy an official SAT or ACT preparation guide, they are issued by organizations that conduct these tests. These exams, frankly, are no more difficult than the exam, they just have their own specifics.

But still need to write an essay?

The most difficult moment when you enter a Western university is an introductory essay. It differs significantly from the compositions familiar to Russian students. For admissions offices, essays are the only way to learn about the important qualities of an applicant. It is in this text that he must show his erudition, ability to think logically and non-standard, express ideas in a structured way, as well as creativity and life guidelines. Therefore, it depends on the essay whether the applicant will enter the university or not.
