Worship Notes

"Philosophy of Worship Principles" (Part 8, Section 1) by Dr. Tom Rush

Today's selection from Dr. Rush's "Philosophy of Worship Principles" is part of a lengthier section on musical style as it relates to music selection. Next week's article will feature the next part of point 8, but it was unable to be included due to required space. So, as you're reading, if it feels like there should be more to the point, you're right! Stay tuned for next week's article!

8. Proper worship involves a biblical basis for music selection. One of the most critical aspects of worship leadership in our present cultural situation is that of the musical content of our worship services. There are two areas that need to be addressed: the lyrical content of the music chosen and the type or genre of the music itself. The lyrics of songs used in worship should be doctrinally sound and not need convoluted explanations; they should be clear and easily understood. Much in modern music is doctrinally weak and sometimes just plain false. Regardless of the style of music, the words should honor God and be in line with Scriptural principles. The style itself, however, is not unimportant. Frankly, I find the terms "traditional," "blended," and "contemporary" to be somewhat confusing because I'm not sure anyone really knows what constitutes one as opposed to the other. Many churches are having several different styles of music in a variety of worship services and sometimes worship settings, apparently in order to attract people who would enjoy the type of music used in that service. This is not in and of itself a bad thing, but worship isn't about us, it's about God. This methodology is all too often "man-centered." Since worship is about God, it should be centered on Him. If worship honors and glorifies the Lord, then all of us should be satisfied and joyous in the process. We should strive for excellence and work to maintain a "God focus" in all of our efforts at corporate worship.
