Israel votes today

Israel goes to the polls today (Tuesday 9 April) for its National Elections.

Polling averages from March 22 to April 5 indicates that the Blue White party, led by Benny Gantz and Yair Lapid, would win slightly more seats than Likud, but that Netanyahu will be better placed to form a governing coalition because of the relative strength of small right wing parties, including those that joined his 2015 coalition and possibly Zehut - a right-wing libertarian party supported by right and left wing voters - that has refused to say at this stage whether it would join a Gantz or Netanyahu led Government.

The fate of the small parties could ultimately decide who forms the next Government. According to current polls, a Netanyahu-led right wing coalition looks likely, but two of the parties who served in his last Government – Yisrael Beitenu (right) and Kulanu (centrist) may not meet the minimum threshold of 3.25% of votes required to get into the Knesset. If either party fails to meet the threshold it could damage the chances of a new right wing coalition.
